CARBON OFFSETS

It's almost inevitable that our businesses function is a source of carbon dioxide emission, a major factor in degrading climate conditions. We power our computers (often with energy from coal-burning power plants), we fly, we drive to our jobs, and we order prints and albums that are shipped across great distances. All these things spew CO<sub>2</sub> into the atmosphere.

But it's not hard to fund projects that either remove the gas, or reduce it in other industries. That's where carbon offset agencies come in: They take a donation and use it to fund carbon reduction projects around the world. Such projects include reforestation (trees take in carbon dioxide and turn it into oxygen), replacing regular light bulbs with energy-efficient CFLs, funding wind energy plants, or building power plants that run on cow manure.

So if I want to offset my business' carbon footprint, I can go to a carbon offset agency, like carbonfund.org, and use their online calculators to determine how much carbon my business is responsible for each year. With that footprint—let's say 20 tons—I can either buy an offset for 20 tons, or I can just buy a 30-ton small business offset and use the leftover as credit toward toward my personal life. I'm partial to carbonfund.org, since it's a nonprofit with a good track record.—Nathan Welton, Dreamtime Images
